Seriously, the question may be asked whether anything at all is secomplished by the tra-ditional tactics of sending out campaign speakers; we doubt whether a single instance could be addresed of a man who had changed his mind, or of a citizen who had been per-suaded to change his vote, by any eloquence or argument of a campaign speaker. Nor is the reason far to seek. The epinions of the people are formed by an almost infinite mul-titude of facts and circumstances, very few of which are within the range of any speaker's influence. The utmost that the speaker can do is to present a very small number of facts or arguments for the consideration of bis

The author of this volume has made a good eputation for herself as a practiced writer, whose wil, good sense and genuine powers of delineation appear to excellent advantage in this peculiarly interesting story. As its title implies, its purpose is to show that each charactor possesses peculiar attributes that often lie hidden for generations and then crop out. The scenes are hald in the region of the great lakes some thirty years ago, taking in Lake Champlain and the region round about its shores. The grouping of characters includes the American, Irisis, Scotch, French-Canadian, etc., and the tale is well but briefly told. It is well worth reading, both for its peculiar character and its intrinsic interest. The danger that lucks in the result of this
